Food Safety Management: Chapter 4. Allergens René Crevel, Stella Cochrane

Food allergy is recognized as an important public health issue, requiring collaboration between multiple stakeholders, including the food industry, to be effectively addressed. Allergen management in food production aims to assure the safety of allergic consumers. This is achieved by accurate allergen labeling and ensuring that either products do not contain unintended allergens in amounts that pose an unacceptable risk to food allergy sufferers or meaningful precautionary labeling is applied. To ensure this, food allergen risk management must be integrated into general food safety management and allergen risks considered at all stages of the food manufacturing process. Recent advances in understanding of minimum eliciting doses make it possible to estimate quantitatively the risk from cross-contact. However, validation studies and the use of analytical methods to quantify levels of carry-over are subject to many potential pitfalls and benefit from a rigorous approach to design, conduct and interpretation.
